The Tension-Desire-Action Formula

Here's the simple mechanism that drives all human behavior:

Tension → Desire → Action to Satisfy the Desire

When a need isn't met, you feel tension. That tension creates desire. That desire motivates action.

If you're hungry, tension arises. You desire food. You take action to eat.

If you feel alone, tension arises. You desire connection. You take action to seek people.

If you can't sleep, tension arises. You desire rest. You take action to find solutions.

What this means for your scripts:

Your hook creates or calls out tension. Your content speaks to the desire. Your close points toward action (follow, save, join).

Most people skip the tension part. They jump straight to advice or wisdom. But without tension, there's no desire. Without desire, there's no action.

Yang Mun's sleep script:

"You try to sleep but your mind won't let you. You're lying there hour after hour. Eyes closed. Still awake."

That's tension. He's not just describing insomnia. He's making you FEEL it.

And if you've ever experienced that, reading those words creates an echo of that tension in your body right now.

Once the tension exists, the desire for relief is automatic. You don't have to sell the desire. You just have to speak to it.

Then when he offers the insight, the viewer is primed to receive it. They want relief. He's offering a path.
