How People Actually Make Decisions

Here's the reality that changes everything about how you write:

People don't make decisions logically and then feel emotions about them.

They make decisions emotionally and then find logical reasons to justify them.

This isn't manipulation. This is how human psychology works.

When someone decides to follow your AI influencer, it's not because they carefully weighed the pros and cons.

It's because something in your content made them FEEL:

- Understood
- Hopeful
- Less alone
- Inspired
- Curious
- Safe

The emotion comes first. The logic comes after.

This is why purely informational content doesn't convert. You can give someone the most accurate, well-researched advice in the world. If it doesn't make them feel something, they scroll past and forget it existed.

The structure that works:

Emotion → Logic → Emotion

Not: Logic → Logic → Logic

Lead with emotion. Connect with how they feel. Make them feel seen and understood. Then deliver the insight, the wisdom, the information. Then close with emotion again.

Leave them with a feeling they want to return to.

Look at Yang Mun's scripts. They're not informational lectures. They're emotional experiences wrapped around simple wisdom.

"Life is going to work out perfectly for you."

That's not information. That's a feeling. And it's the first line, not the last.
