The Feature-Benefit Distinction (Why Most Advice Falls Flat)

Here's a concept from advertising that most AI influencers completely miss:

Features are what something IS. Benefits are what you GET.

When you only state features, the viewer's brain is subconsciously asking: "BIG DEAL! What's in it for me?"

Every time you give advice without connecting it to the benefit, you're losing them.

Feature: "Practice gratitude daily."
Benefit: "Practice gratitude daily and watch your anxiety dissolve within weeks."

Feature: "Join my 30-day healing journey."
Benefit: "In 30 days, feel the peace you haven't felt in years."

Feature: "Meditate for 10 minutes each morning."
Benefit: "Meditate for 10 minutes each morning and start your day from calm instead of chaos."

Feature: "Set boundaries in your relationships."
Benefit: "Set boundaries in your relationships and watch the resentment that's been building for years finally release."

See the difference?

Features are information. Benefits are transformation.

Your audience doesn't want information. They want transformation.

The test:

After every piece of advice or insight in your script, ask yourself: "So what? What does this actually DO for them?"

Then say THAT.

Yang Mun rarely gives naked advice. Everything connects back to how it will make them feel, what will change, what they'll experience.
