Belief Re-Ranking: The Power of Reframes

Here's something powerful:

You don't have to change someone's beliefs. You just have to change the importance of their beliefs.

People resist direct challenges to what they believe. But they're open to new perspectives that don't threaten their existing worldview.

This is why reframes work so well.

A reframe doesn't say "you're wrong." It says "here's a different way to look at it."

Examples:

Instead of: "Stop being so anxious" (challenges their experience)
Reframe: "Your anxiety isn't weakness. It's your brain trying to protect you with outdated software."

Instead of: "Just be more confident" (challenges their self-image)
Reframe: "Confidence isn't about knowing you'll succeed. It's about knowing you can handle failure."

Instead of: "You need to love yourself" (feels preachy)
Reframe: "You don't need to love yourself. You just need to stop being at war with yourself."

Yang Mun's sleep reframe:

"You've tried all the tips from the internet. Breathing tricks, counting, music, nothing really works because the problem isn't sleep. It's that your mind doesn't know when to turn off."

He's not saying the tips are wrong. He's saying the viewer has been solving the wrong problem.

That's a reframe.

Reframes create "aha" moments.

That feeling of "I never thought of it that way" is incredibly powerful. It makes your content feel valuable and makes viewers want to save and return.

Every good script should have at least one reframe. A moment where you shift their perspective on their problem.