From Psychology to Production

You now understand WHY persuasion works.

You know about the Life-Force 8, mental movies, the tension-desire-action formula, reframes, and the emotional journey framework.

But knowing the theory and actually producing scripts are two different things.

This lesson bridges that gap. By the end of it, you'll have a system that generates unlimited scripts for your AI influencer scripts that use everything we covered in the psychology lesson, automatically.

No more staring at a blank page. No more generic AI outputs. No more guessing what to say.

The Script Generator System

I've created a mega prompt specifically for AI influencer scripts.

It's not a simple "write me a script about X" prompt. It's a complete system that:

1. Asks you intake questions about your character, niche, and audience
2. Stores that context so every script is tailored to YOUR influencer
3. Has all the psychology built in (Life-Force 8, mental movies, reframes, emotional journey)
4. Includes winning script examples so Claude understands what good looks like
5. Offers multiple script types for different content goals
6. Guides you through iteration so you can refine outputs until they're perfect

How to Set It Up

Step 1: Create a Claude Project

Go to Claude and create a new Project. Name it something like "[Your Character Name] Scripts" or "AI Influencer Content."

Projects let Claude remember context across conversations. This means you don't have to re-explain your character every time you want a new script.

Step 2: Add the Mega Prompt

Open your new project and go to the Project Instructions section (the persistent context that Claude always sees).

Paste the entire mega prompt into the Project Instructions.

Step 3: Start a Conversation

Start a new conversation within the project. Claude will immediately ask you the intake questions:

- Character name and niche
- Character vibe and unique angle
- Target audience demographics
- Top 3 pain points
- Secret fears
- Desired transformation
- What they've tried that failed
- Voice and style preferences

Answer these thoroughly. The more specific you are, the better your scripts will be. You can give it your niche selection document and avatar research document as well.

Step 4: Confirm and Generate

Claude will summarize your character and audience back to you. Confirm it's accurate (or correct anything that's off).

Then you're ready to generate scripts.

The Five Script Types

The system will generate five different types of scripts. Each serves a different purpose in your content strategy.

Type 1: Affirmation/Vision Scripts

What it is: Paint a picture of their transformed future life. Heavy on hope and empowerment. Light on teaching.

Best for: Building emotional connection, high save rates, content that makes people feel something.

When to use: When you want to inspire rather than instruct. Great for morning content, milestone moments, or when your audience needs encouragement.

Example request: "Give me an affirmation script about finally feeling at peace after years of anxiety."

Type 2: Problem-Solution Scripts

What it is: Call out a specific pain point, show you understand it deeply, then deliver one actionable insight or reframe.

Best for: Demonstrating authority, providing tangible value, building trust through usefulness.

When to use: When you want to help them with a specific struggle. The bread and butter of value-driven content.

Example request: "Give me a problem-solution script about people who can't stop checking their phone first thing in the morning."

Type 3: "Quiet Truth" Scripts

What it is: Gentle, intimate wisdom. Feels like advice from a wise friend late at night. Slower paced, more reflective.

Best for: Deep connection, comments like "I needed this today," content that feels personal.

When to use: When you want to create intimacy with your audience.

Example request: "Give me a quiet truth script for people who feel like they have to hold everything together for everyone else."

Type 4: Pattern Interrupt Scripts

What it is: Start with something unexpected that stops the scroll, then pivot to deliver value.

Best for: Reaching new audiences, algorithm boost, standing out in crowded feeds.

When to use: When you need to grab attention fast. Good for breaking through when your usual content isn't reaching new people.

Example request: "Give me a pattern interrupt script about the hidden cost of always being 'fine.'"

Type 5: Story-Based Scripts

What it is: Use a brief metaphor, analogy, or mini-story to deliver the message. The lesson emerges from the narrative.

Best for: Memorable content, shares, explaining complex ideas simply.

When to use: When a direct approach feels too heavy, or when you want to make an idea stick through narrative.

Example request: "Give me a story-based script using the metaphor of seasons to talk about difficult life transitions."

How to Request Scripts

Be specific with your requests. The more context you give, the better the output ot should fit for your niche..

Weak request: "Write me a script about anxiety."

Strong request: "Write me a problem-solution script about the specific type of anxiety where you replay conversations in your head wondering if you said the wrong thing. My audience is mostly women 25-35 who are high achievers but secretly feel like they're failing."

Even stronger request: "Write me a problem-solution script about replay anxiety, when you can't stop analyzing conversations wondering if you said something wrong. Focus on the exhaustion of it, like their brain won't give them a break. End with a reframe about how this actually shows they care about people, not that they're broken."

The system has all the psychology built in. But YOU know your audience better than anyone. Feed that knowledge into your requests.

The Iteration Process

First drafts are rarely perfect. That's normal. The power is in iteration.

After Claude delivers a script, you have options:

Adjust the tone: "This feels a bit too soft. Make it more direct like a mentor giving tough love, not a friend consoling."

Keep the hook, change the body: "I love the opening two lines. Keep those but try a different angle for the rest. Focus more on the freedom they'll feel, less on the pain."

Try a different type: "This problem-solution approach isn't hitting. Try the same topic as a quiet truth script instead."

Punch up specific elements: "The reframe is weak. Give me something that'll actually make them stop and think. Something they haven't heard before."

Request variations: "Give me three different hooks for this same script. I want options to test."

Don't accept mediocre scripts. Push until you get something that genuinely moves you. If it doesn't move you, it won't move your audience.

What Makes a Script "Done"

Before you approve a script for production, run it through this checklist:z

Hook check:

- Does the first line stop the scroll?
- Would YOU stop for this if you saw it?
- Does it call out the audience or pain point specifically?z

Mental movie check:

- Can you visualize the scenes being described?
- Is the language specific or vague?

Reframe check:

- Is there an "aha" moment?
- Does it shift their perspective on the problem?
- Will they think "I never thought of it that way"?

Emotion check:

- Does it make you FEEL something?
- Does it end on emotion, not information?
- Would someone want to save this to return to the feeling?

Voice check:

- Does it sound like your character?
- Is the tone consistent throughout?
- Would this feel natural spoken out loud?

If any answer is "no" or "not really," iterate until it's "yes."

The 80/20 of Script Generation

You'll quickly learn that certain topics and approaches work better for your specific audience.

Pay attention to:

- Which scripts feel easiest to write (Claude nails them quickly)
- Which scripts you're most excited to produce
- But most importantly.. Which scripts get the best engagement once posted

Double down on what works. If problem-solution scripts about sleep and overthinking consistently outperform everything else, make more of those. Don't force variety for its own sake.

The algorithm rewards consistency in what resonates, not variety for variety's sake.

You can introduce and test new concepts when you have a formula down..

What's Next

You now have a system for generating unlimited general content scripts, the kind that build audience, trust, and authority.

But eventually, you'll want to convert that audience into revenue.

In the next lesson, we'll cover CTA and conversion scripts: when to use them, how to write them without killing trust, and the psychology of turning followers into buyers.

That's where the money is made.
