imarketing.courses

CONTENTSYSTEM.AI

MODULE 2.3

The Saturation Myth (and the truth inside it)

The most misunderstood idea in the business. Getting it right changes how you read every product.

imarketing.courses

MODULE 2.3

The Saturation Myth (and the truth inside it)

Saturation is the most misunderstood idea in this business, and getting it right changes how you read every product. The myth is the lazy version: people see a few others running a product, call it saturated and dead, and move on. That part is usually wrong. But there is a real truth underneath it, and you need both halves.

The myth half

THE MYTH

"This product is saturated. Skip it."

A few others are running it, so the audience must be tapped out. Drop it and find a new product.

WHAT'S ACTUALLY HAPPENING

The concept is worn out, not the product.

The audience still wants it. They are just tired of that one angle. Change the concept, the angle, the audience, or the variant, and you go viral all over again.

Most of the time, when someone says a product is saturated, the product is not saturated at all. The concept is. The specific way everyone is generating and presenting it to go viral has been seen by the algorithm a hundred times, so that format stops getting pushed. This is view saturation, not market saturation. The audience still wants the product. They are tired of that one angle.

The fix is not to drop the product, it is to change the concept, the marketing angle, the audience you target, or the way you generate the video. A new color, a new variant, a new audience, the same product, and you go viral all over again.

imarketing.courses

REAL-WORLD ILLUSTRATION

Think about how big creator-led accounts that go viral repeatedly actually do it. They are not stumbling onto a new product every two weeks. Their average video is fine, then every couple of weeks they switch up the concept, and the new concept explodes. The audience is the same. The product or the personal brand is the same. The thing that changed was the format. That is content saturation breaking, not market saturation.

The truth inside the myth

Saturation is real in one specific sense, and this is the deepest point in the whole framing. It comes down to whether the audience is general-base or niched-down.

TYPE ONE

General-Base Audience

Huge, broad, almost anyone could be a customer.

Think parenting and baby, the dog niche, broadly beloved fandoms like Spider-Man, or any product with universal appeal. The realistic buyer pool is in the tens or hundreds of millions.

The market share is so large that even if three or four people are already running the product, the algorithm can keep showing it to fresh viewers for a long time before the niche is anywhere close to tapped out. You can be the third or fourth person on a product, copy proof of concept directly, and still go viral.

This is why you see lower-converting wow-factor products doing 50+ million views: the audience is everyone.

TYPE TWO

Niched-Down Audience

Smaller, specific, a tight ceiling on who will ever see it.

Pick something specific like an Ozzy Osborne fan product, or any tightly defined subculture. Smaller market share, a much tighter ceiling on how many people will ever want the product.

In a niched-down market, content saturation kicks in fast. If three or four operators have already covered the obvious concepts, a meaningful chunk of the available audience has already been hit, and you cannot just copy one-to-one and expect to break through.

Here you must differentiate: new angle, new concept, new variant, or new country (the four levers covered in Section 12). If you cannot bring any of those, walking away is the right call.

imarketing.courses

"How big is this niche, and do I have a genuinely new angle, product, or concept to bring to it?"

HOLD BOTH AT ONCE

A product is rarely as saturated as it looks, because the concept is usually what is worn out, not the demand, and you can revive it by changing the angle. But market share is finite and scales with niche size, so in a niched-down market that has already been run through every obvious way, walking away can be correct. Big general-base niche, or a real new angle: worth running, even as the third or fourth person on it. Small niched-down market already exhausted with nothing new to add: skip it.