imarketing.courses

CONTENTSYSTEM.AI

MODULE 3.4

Hybrids

Combining the first two methods. In practice, this is where a lot of your strongest content ends up.

imarketing.courses

MODULE 3.4

Hybrids

The third method is just combining the first two, and in practice this is where a lot of your strongest content will end up.

The idea is that you do not have to make a video entirely one way or the other. You can mix AI-generated parts with repurposed parts in the same video, using each one for what it is best at.

A common version, end to end

REPURPOSED

The hook

A short borrowed clip whose only job is to stop the scroll. You are using what already proves to grab attention.

AI

The body & reveal

Your AI-generated content takes over for the part that actually sells. The product moment, the demonstration, the result, the reveal. Full control over presentation.

The hook borrows from what is already proven to grab people. The AI handles the part where you need full control over how the product is presented.

No fixed recipe

You can run this the other way too. An AI-generated hook, then repurposed material in the body. Or AI for the character and the reveal, with a repurposed clip dropped in the middle for a specific moment you want. There is no single fixed recipe. The point is that these are tools, and once you understand what each one is good at, you mix them to get the best version of any given video.

imarketing.courses

Easier with AI

A controlled product reveal. A precise before-and-after. Anything where you need full control over how the product is shown.

Easier from proven content

A hook that is already getting people to stop scrolling. Reactions, moments, and visuals that have already proven they grab attention.

"You build the best video by using the right tool for each piece of it."

The reason hybrids matter is flexibility. Some moments are easier to nail with AI. Other moments are easier to grab from proven content. When you can pull from both, you are not limited by what either method can do alone.