Selling a Vibe

The feel of the video has to match the buyer. The same product, made the same way, lands completely differently for two different audiences.

MODULE 4.4

Selling a Vibe

The last piece of making content that works is matching the feel of the video to the audience you are selling to. This is more advanced, but it matters, because the type of product and the type of buyer decide what the content should feel like.

Not every product gets the same kind of content. If you are selling to women, the content should not feel the same as content selling to men. The aesthetic is different. The pacing can be different. The look, the colors, the energy, all of it should match the audience. Content made for one group will not land the same way with another group, so you build the vibe around whoever you are actually targeting.

What the best accounts do

They match the aesthetic of the content to the exact audience the product is for. If the audience is into something fast and high-energy, the content is fast and high-energy. If the audience is older and the product is calmer, the content is slower and calmer. The video feels like it belongs to that world, which is what makes the audience trust it and engage with it.

Fast, high-energy audience

Punchier cuts. Brighter or bolder color treatment. Higher BPM music. Pacing that does not let up.

Calmer, older audience

Slower pacing. Warmer or softer tones. Less aggressive cuts. Music that supports rather than drives.

How this ties to the rest of the section

Your character should match the audience. Your image should fit the world the product lives in. Your pacing should fit who is watching. When all of those line up, the audience sees content that feels made for them, and that is what converts. When they do not line up, even a technically clean video falls flat, because it does not feel like it is for the person watching.

THE TEST TO RUN ON EVERY VIDEO

Do not just ask whether the video is good. Ask whether it feels right for the specific person you are trying to reach. The vibe has to match the buyer.
