imarketing.courses

CONTENTSYSTEM.AI

MODULE 4.5

ICP: Knowing Who Actually Buys

Every strong video is built for one specific person. Not a vague crowd. One buyer. Get the wrong buyer and the right product still flops.

imarketing.courses

MODULE 4.5

ICP: Knowing Who Actually Buys

Every strong video is built for one specific person. Not a vague crowd, one buyer. That person is your ideal customer profile, your ICP. The hook you write, the music you pick, the words on screen, the scenes you generate, all of it should be aimed at that single person.

When a video feels like it was made for everyone, it lands with no one. When it feels made for one specific buyer, that buyer stops scrolling because it feels like it is speaking directly to them.

Passionate niche vs. passionate audience

The mistake that quietly kills good products is confusing a passionate niche with a passionate audience. They are not the same thing, and the gap between them is where money gets lost.

Passionate niche

A topic huge numbers of people care about intensely. The passion is real.

Passionate audience

The specific group within that niche who will actually pull out a card and buy your product. Often a much smaller, different cut of the niche.

A niche can be on fire with passion and still contain almost no buyers for what you are selling, if you aim at the wrong people inside it.

imarketing.courses

CASE IN POINT

Football, a famous player, and a poster nobody buys.

Football is one of the most passionate niches on the planet. Say you are running a product built around a famous player, a poster or a piece of memorabilia. The obvious move is to aim it at die-hard fans, so you target young men who live and breathe the sport.

FLOPS

Aim the poster at die-hard fans. The passionate fan is not the buyer. They follow the player, they cheer for the player, but they are not opening their wallet for memorabilia.

CONVERTS

Aim the same product at the parent buying it as a gift for a kid who is obsessed with that player. Same product. Right buyer. Now it sells.

Right niche, completely wrong buyer. The passion was real, but you pointed the product at the people who feel the passion instead of the people who spend the money.

Go one level deeper

When you pick a product and start building content, do not stop at "what niche is this in." Go one level deeper and ask who inside that niche actually opens their wallet. Sometimes it is the fan. Often it is the person buying for the fan: the parent, the partner, the friend looking for a gift. Build the entire video for that buyer. The product can be identical. Pointing it at the real ICP instead of the obvious one is frequently the whole difference between a video that gets views and dies and a video that gets views and sells.

AN ANGLE-GENERATION TOOL

This connects directly back to saturation. One of the most reliable ways to revive a product that looks worn out is to change the ICP. Same product, a different buyer inside the niche, a fresh angle the algorithm and the audience have not seen. Knowing your real buyer is not just a conversion tool, it is an angle-generation tool.