imarketing.courses

CONTENTSYSTEM.AI

MODULE 9.1

The Website That Converts

Your mom should instantly trust the site. Your grandma should reach checkout without getting confused. Trust and simplicity. That is the bar.

imarketing.courses

MODULE 9.1

The Website That Converts

Your website is where the sale is won or lost, and the principles for a converting store are simple and ruthless.

> "Your mom should instantly trust the site. Your grandma should reach checkout without getting confused."

Trust and simplicity. That is the bar.

Color and visual design: the 60/30/10 rule

Keep the store visually clean and professional using a simple color balance.

This keeps the site looking branded and intentional instead of cluttered and amateur, which is a big part of looking trustworthy. A site that looks thrown together kills trust before anyone reads a word.

The principles, in order of priority

1 Reduce friction all the way down to checkout.

Every extra step, every extra field, every moment of confusion between "I want this" and "I bought it" loses customers. Strip the path down. The buyer should go from product to paid in as few taps as possible, with express options like Apple Pay so they can buy in one motion instead of typing out card details and shipping info. The easier you make paying, the more people complete the purchase. Friction is where impulse dies.

imarketing.courses

2

Build trust with social proof and clear product imagery.

People buy when they believe other people have bought and been happy. Reviews, ratings, and clear imagery of the product in use do the heavy lifting here. The buyer landed on your site straight from a video, they do not know you, so the page has to immediately reassure them that this is real and that others have purchased it and been satisfied. Show the product clearly and back it with proof.

3

Avoid choice overload.

This is a subtle one that costs a lot of sales. When you give people too many options, they get overwhelmed and many of them buy nothing at all. A well-known study on jam: a display offering a small handful of flavors led to far more actual purchases than a display offering a couple dozen, because the giant selection paralyzed people. The lesson: keep the choices tight. Do not bury the buyer in variants and add-ons and ten different bundles. Give them a clear, simple offer and a clear path to take it. Fewer options, more sales.