Most beginners build too early, for products that never get traction. Let the content prove the product first, then build.

MODULE 10.1

When To Build the Store

The most common beginner mistake here is building the store too early, before you know whether the product is even worth selling. You spend time and money setting up a store for a product that never gets traction. Then you do it again for the next product, and the next. That is wasted effort. The smarter approach is to let the content prove the product first, then build.

The two clear triggers

TRIGGER ONE · DEMAND

~20K views

Real traction plus people actively asking where to buy.

Around 20K views with clear demand in the comments is your signal. The views plus the demand together tell you this product has a pulse and people want it, so now it is worth the effort of setting up a place to sell it. You are building in response to proven interest, not on a hope.

TRIGGER TWO · CEILING

~80K views

Build the store no matter what.

If a video crosses around 80K views, you build the store no matter what, even if the demand signals are quieter than you would like. That many views is too much attention to have no working store behind it. The cost of not being able to capture the traffic is greater than the cost of building.

"Build when you hit roughly 20K views with clear demand, or the moment you cross 80K views regardless."

Until one of those happens, keep your focus on content and let the product earn the store.
