imarketing.courses

CONTENTSYSTEM.AI

MODULE 11.2

The Split-Testing System

Change one thing at a time. Lock in the winners. Rotate only the background to print on demand.

imarketing.courses

MODULE 11.2

The Split-Testing System

Split testing is how you take one outlier and turn it into consistent virality. Most people split test wrong. They change a random clip, or they change a bunch of things at once, and then they have no idea what actually made the difference. Real split testing means changing one thing at a time, with purpose, so you can identify exactly which elements are responsible for the performance.

The five variables of every video

1
Visual hook
What the viewer sees in the opening moment.

2
Text hook
The on-screen text at the start.

3
Sound
The audio or music.

4
Movement
The action happening through the video.

5
Background
The setting or environment.

These five are your variables. Split testing means taking your outlier and testing these one at a time to find which versions of each element are the winners.

imarketing.courses

The system, round by round

ROUND ONE

Take your outlier and make five variants of it.

In each variant you keep everything exactly the same except one element. So: one video identical but with a new sound. One identical but with a new text hook. One identical but with a new visual hook. One identical but with new movement. One identical but with a new background. Same everything, change one element each time. Do not change two things at once. Do not redo the whole process.

Out of those five, you are looking for one that does as well as the original outlier or better. Say you changed the sound and that version also hit 10K, matching the original. That tells you the account likes that new sound. You now have a confirmed winning element. You keep it going forward.

ROUND TWO

Lock in the winner and test the rest.

Everything stays the same including the new winning sound, and you test the other elements one at a time against it. Same everything plus the winning sound, new text hook. Same everything plus the winning sound, new visual hook. Same everything plus the winning sound, new movement. Same everything plus the winning sound, new background.

Again you are looking for the variant that matches or beats the outlier, and whatever wins, you lock that in too. By now you should be seeing the videos climb. If your outlier was 10K, by the second round you are often looking at videos doing 100K to 200K, or one that has genuinely gone viral.

ROUND THREE & FOUR

Keep going the same way.

Each round, you hold all your confirmed winning elements constant and test the remaining ones, one at a time, locking in each winner as you find it. You work through sound, visual hook, movement, text hook, and background until you have a confirmed winning version of all of them.

imarketing.courses

THE PAYOFF

All five winning elements locked. Now you only rotate the background.

To keep going viral consistently, you keep every winning element exactly the same and you only change the background. Have a few different backgrounds you can drop the product into, and just rotate through them. Same winning sound, same winning hooks, same winning movement, new background each time.

That is how those accounts that hit 50K views on nearly every single video do it. They found their winning elements and now they just swap the background and recycle.

With AI, this is even cleaner than it was when people had to physically film in different locations. Rotating the background just means generating the same proven video in a new setting. You are not driving to new locations or rebuilding sets. You hold every winning element and regenerate it against a fresh background, over and over.

Two rules that sit on top of everything

Don't split test in a vacuum

While you are split testing your outlier, you should also be testing brand new ad formats in parallel. A practical split if you post three times a day: one or two videos split testing your current winner, and one video testing a fresh format or concept.

Don't rely on a single winning format

Any one winning format will eventually die out. The goal is to build up several winning formats, not one, so you always have something carrying you when one fades. While you scale one winner, constantly fish for the next outlier with new formats. You can also refresh inside a winning format, occasionally testing a new sound or text hook.

"Get an outlier, make five one-change variants, keep what matches or beats it, repeat round by round, then rotate only the background to go viral consistently."

All while testing new formats on the side so you end up with five winning formats instead of one.