MODULE 12.4

International Expansion: Taking Products to New Countries

The fourth lever from the previous module, new country, deserves its own treatment because it is genuinely one of the highest-leverage moves available, and most operators ignore it.

The play is simple. If a product is working in one country, and the audience exists in another country, you can run that same product in the new market and often be the first or near-first operator there. While everyone else fights for the same crowded US audience, you are sitting alone in a country where the product is brand new. The competition is a fraction of what it is in the US, and every product you find on the burner you can be the first person to run there.

Which countries actually convert

Not every country is worth running in. Some are high-converting, some are not, and treating them the same is how you waste effort.

HIGH-CONVERTING MARKETS

Where to actually run.

🇺🇸 United States | 🇨🇦 Canada | 🇬🇧 United Kingdom | 🇦🇺 Australia | 🇩🇪 Germany | Parts of Western Europe

The US is the largest and still the most lucrative. After that come Canada, the UK, Australia, and parts of Western Europe. Within Europe, Germany is the standout, treated in its own block below.

LOW-CONVERTING MARKETS · AVOID AS PRIMARY TARGET

Where not to spend your effort.

Most of Latin America | Spanish-speaking markets | India | Much of Southeast Asia | Parts of Eastern Europe

The infrastructure, income, and buyer payment systems do not support the conversion rates you need. Demand from these regions does not turn into orders, no matter how loud it looks in the comments.

THE STANDOUT · MOST UNDEREXPLOITED MARKET

🇩🇪 Germany.

Currently one of the most underexploited markets in this business, with strong buyer power and far less competition than the US. If you are based in the EU, especially if you can target Germany natively, the leverage is enormous. Most of the top one-percent operators in this space are concentrated in the US fighting each other. Running products to Germany is sitting in a room with a fraction of the crowd.

Country-product fit

Before you take a product anywhere, check that the country actually wants it. Every country has its own quirks, regulations, and cultural fit. Germany, for example, is strict on certain product types, including some lighting and motorcycle accessories that are flat-out illegal there but get sold freely in the US. A super-gimmicky product that prints in the US may flop hard in Germany because the buyer is more discerning.

"Match the product to the market. Look at the niche, the regulations, and whether the cultural appetite exists."

How to actually target a new country

There are two ways, and they differ by platform.

imarketing.courses

THE EASY ONE

Instagram & Facebook

Just change the language. Change your captions and on-screen text to the language of the target country. Both platforms read language as a strong signal of region, so an account posting in German gets pushed to German viewers natively.
No second phone, no SIM card, no VPN gymnastics for the posting side. Change the language, post in it, and the platform handles the rest.

THE HEAVIER ONE

TikTok

Changing the language alone is not enough. TikTok ties the account more tightly to its detected location. The cleanest way is to use a second device with a VPN locked to that country, set up the account from that environment, and post in the target language. The VPN does the work. You do not need a foreign SIM card, that is a myth covered in Section 2.

REUSE YOUR WINNING CONTENT

For both platforms, when you take a product over, you can copy your existing winning content one-to-one into the new market. The audience there has not seen it. You are not competing with the operators who ran it in the original country. Reuse the proven content, translate where it matters, and run it.

What this looks like in practice

Pick one converting country other than your home market. If you are in the EU, Germany is almost always the best play. If you are elsewhere, pick the high-converting market with the lowest competition for your niche. Then for every winning product you find or develop, check whether it has been run in that country. Most of the time it has not. That is your lane.

"For the right product and the right operator, a whole region is sitting empty."

You do not need to be in a crowded market fighting for attention. There are entire converting countries with a fraction of the competition, sitting open. The fourth lever is often the one that produces your biggest months.
