Script Engagement Hacks

The skeleton niche is significantly more popular on TikTok than on YouTube.

Even though there are already many accounts in this niche, TikTok still seems to generate much higher view potential for this format.

Because of that, TikTok is an incredible source of ideas.

If you ever run out of topics, simply scroll through skeleton videos for a few minutes, write down several ideas and then either:

- create a similar concept based on an outlier video (explained earlier in the course) or
- feed several examples into Claude or ChatGPT and ask it to generate new ideas based on those concepts.

The core script writing system was already explained earlier in the course.

This section focuses on additional hacks you can add to your scripts to increase engagement.

1. Socrates Inserts

Right now, Socrates is pure gold in this niche.

It has become a massive meme and not using it means leaving a lot of potential engagement on the table.

This trend will not last forever, but right now it can significantly boost your videos.

The basic idea is simple:

Add a moment in your script where Socrates suddenly appears and asks a question.

That alone is often enough to trigger comments.

Many creators are now even building entire scripts where Socrates becomes a recurring character.

If you struggle to come up with ideas for these scenes, Claude is extremely good at generating them.

If the AI struggles, simply give it a few example scripts that include Socrates scenes and ask it to generate new variations.

Personally, I use a lighter approach where Socrates appears briefly and interacts with the main character.

However, some creators go much more aggressive and turn Socrates into the punchline of the joke.

Examples include:

- characters yelling “It's Fing Socrates again!”
- physically throwing Socrates out of the scene
- sending him back to Greece

There are many ways to do it.

The key point is simply including Socrates in the script, because right now audiences both love and hate seeing him appear in these videos.

And that generates comments.

2. Use Specific Historical Characters

Another strong engagement trick is using specific characters instead of generic descriptions.

For example, instead of writing:

"Ancient Greek philosopher"

you would write:

- Socrates
- Plato
- Diogenes

Using specific names makes the script:

- easier to imagine
- more interesting
- more recognizable for the viewer

People tend to engage more when they recognize familiar figures.

The same applies to other roles.

Instead of writing:

"King"

specify which king.

Whenever possible, avoid vague descriptions and replace them with specific characters or historical figures.

Specificity makes your script feel richer and more engaging.

3. Humor (Especially Dark Humor)

Scripts without humor can sometimes feel a bit flat.

Adding humor - especially slightly dark or absurd humor - often makes the content much more engaging.

If you're not sure how to write this style of humor, you can train Claude very easily.

Simply feed it several example scripts that already contain the type of humor you want and ask it to generate new scripts in the same style.

The more examples you give it, the better the results usually become.

4. Characters Speaking Lines

This is technically not a script hack itself, but your script should allow space for it.

If you're using tools like Kling or Veo3, you can generate animations with characters speaking lines directly.

This means characters can:

- say short sentences
- ask questions
- react to situations

Using this occasionally adds a surprising level of production quality and realism to your videos.

For example, in some of my own videos I let Socrates speak directly in the animation, using Kling to generate the voice.

I then remove the ElevenLabs voiceover for that moment and use the generated dialogue instead.

I also sometimes do this with characters like:

- Spartans
- tax collectors

These moments make the video feel more dynamic and often trigger more comments.

Final Tip

Script engagement usually comes from small unexpected moments.

You don't need to completely reinvent the structure of your videos.

Often, one well-placed character, joke or meme reference is enough to dramatically increase comments.

The goal is simple:

Make viewers feel like something interesting might happen in the next scene.

If they feel that, they keep watching - and they start commenting.
