Common Beginner Mistakes

1. Expecting Millions Immediately

This is probably the biggest one.

You post your first few videos and expect them to blow up. When they don’t, you assume something is broken.

It’s not.

Yes, it’s possible to hit millions fast. I’ve seen it happen. I’ve done it. But that usually comes from a mix of things:

- strong execution
- good topic selection
- proper channel setup
- timing
- and sometimes a bit of luck

If you’re starting from zero, your first goal isn’t millions.

It’s improvement.

Focus on making each video better than the last one. The views come as a byproduct of skill, not hope.

2. Quitting Too Early

New channels rarely explode overnight.

Sometimes it takes weeks before something clicks. The algorithm needs data. The audience needs exposure. You need refinement.

What matters most in the beginning:

- quality
- consistency

Not perfection. Not virality.

Consistency compounds. One good video can change everything, BUT you won’t get there if you stop at video #6 because it “only got 800 views".

Momentum is built, not granted.

3. Overanalyzing Statistics

Yes, look at your analytics.

No, don't obsess over them.

Retention graphs, swipe rate, average view duration, they're useful to understand patterns. But beginners often overanalyze every dip like it's a disaster.

Here's the truth:

I've had videos with weaker stats go viral.
I've had videos with better stats flop.

Analytics are signals, not guarantees.

If something clearly performs badly repeatedly, adjust.
Otherwise? Post the next video.

Overthinking kills output.

4. Assuming You're Already Doing Everything Right

There is almost always room to grow.

Instead of assuming "this is just how it is", study top creators in your niche.

Ask yourself:

- Is their topic stronger?
- Is their script tighter?
- Is their pacing faster?
- Is the visual quality better?
- Are their videos slightly shorter or more intense?

This isn't about copying blindly. It's about identifying gaps.

Improvement comes from comparison, not ego.

5. Reinventing the Wheel

This one is important.

You don't need to invent a brand new format from scratch to win.

If something is working, there's a reason.

Use proven structures. Use proven themes. Look for outliers on other channels. If a specific idea massively overperforms, study it.

AI makes this even easier.

You don't have to be a "creative genius" generating original concepts 24/7. You need pattern recognition.

Original ideas are great. I encourage them.

But if you're not naturally strong at ideation yet, don't force it. There's no award for struggling alone.

This is the AI era.

Leverage it.
